

McDonald's Angel

An obviously destitute person walked into McDonald's with an empty, tattered coffee container which he had presumably salvaged from the parking lot. A fellow I assumed to be the manager quickly positioned himself to intercept the man.

The pseudo patron asked for a free refill, which is store policy, if in fact, he had bought coffee initially. Just then, the supposed manager caringly said, "Let me get you a new container". He filled the replacement vessel to capacity while at the same time granting the man the respect usually reserved for paying customers.

Several people witnessed the sincere kindness of the act and there were no dry eyes, neither for the recipient, or the bystanders. Soon after I inquired about the manager hoping to thank him for his good deed, but it appears he was only there briefly, having been sent by corporate to make a spot inspection.

No one seems to know his name or how to reach him. I wonder if he is indeed one of the many unknown Angels In Our Lives.

